Sinking predominated over rising. At the west end of the north rampart there was a high grotto hung with four-foot stalactites and surmounted by an eight-foot banner of flame. Another high grotto was in action at the west side of the southeast cove. The eastern dome there had grown very high and was nearly closed over. The driblet cone on the north bench was hissing and a filagree cone glowed on the edge of the north rampart. The wall around the northwest arm appeared five feet high, and the shore bombardment there and at the north and southeast coves was flinging lava over the bank so as to build it up. Flaring chimneys appeared on the north and south sides of the west arm. There was a spurting cone west of the northwest pond. South of the east promontory a large block of...
