Excerpt: .95th Article of the School Law, encouraging the same
 In every school there is more or less demand for books of reference and general instruction, over, above, and beyond those used in the school, which are mere text books to prepare the pupils to crave and appreciate the former. If, after using the text book awhile, this craving be not satisfied, the children fail to see the importance of laying up principle upon principle, and soon become discouraged in their attendance upon school. On the other hand, once let them have access to just such books, and they will soon find, that in the act of devouring their contents, they will need more of the gastric juice of principle to digest them, and feeling this need, with no other incentive than the desire of digestion, they will immediately apply themselves to their texfr books, and...
